

Lady Antebellum Turn Up the Heat in 'Long Stretch of Love' Video: Exclusive Premiere

"It's going to be an interesting journey."

July 2, 2015 6:00 AM

If you think you know Lady Antebellum, think again. Because in their new music video "Long Stretch of Love," which premieres today (July 2) exclusively on CBS Radio station sites and Radio.com (watch below), the GRAMMY-winning trio is out of the cage. They stomp the stage, pour a couple of drinks and turn up the heat.

Literally, as in, they are lighting fires and burning tires.

There are also blaring red lights, smoking drum sets, shiny black leather and plenty of sultry, over-the-shoulder, could-kill-you-if-you're-not-careful glances. It's a big, bold visual statement, and it perfectly matches the dramatic energy and emotion the trio (Hillary Scott, Charles Kelley, Dave Haywood) bring to the song itself, which appears on the band's most recent album 747.

In other words, this ain't your mama's Lady Antebellum.

Related: Interview: Lady Antebellum Step Out of Their Comfort Zone on 747

Written by all three bandmates along with collaborator Josh Kear, "Long Stretch of Love" is about facing the challenge of keeping fires burning during the long haul of an extended relationship.

As Kelley told Radio.com, the song is the most "honest" on the album.

"We're all married. True love is ups and downs. You hit, you miss. You're fire and ice," he said. "But at the end of the day we're not going anywhere. We feel that way in our personal lives and as a band. We're going to have our ups and downs. We've been through a lot. We just have this long stretch of love. This long view of the group."