Thomas Rhett is getting ready to drop his latest album—and it's not going to be your average “country” record.

Rhett had fans vote on which artwork they liked best for his cover, and now, he's giving them a sneak peek of what they can expect to hear.

According to a press release, Rhett grew up listening to different radio stations ranging from rap and rock, to country and oldies, which inspired his newest album name, Tangled Up. It comes out Sept. 25, which was inspired by the different ranges of music he listened to.

“I didn't grow up listening to just one style of music,” said Rhett. “So, I don't know how to write just one style of music. Whether these songs have more of a pop influence or more of a hip-hop influence or a completely country influence, they all—in some crazy way—cohesively sound like a me song.”

The album contains 13 tracks and vary from love tunes to drinking songs. Billboard described it as "retro, contemporary and edgy."

Rhett managed to share some personal music, including 'Die A Happy Man,' which is about his wife.

"I've been somewhat getting crap my entire career from my wife saying, 'When are you going to write a sweet song about me and put it on a record?'" he told Rolling Stone.

If there's anything we can expect from Rhett, it's a diverse lineup.
