The Best Music Festivals of 2020 That Are Actually Worth Your Time, Money, and Effort

Everyone knows about Coachella, so we've curated a list of boutique, new, and old fests that provide unique music and experiences.

In 2020, it's hard to find a truly unique music festival. As top tier promoters, like Live Nation, continue to scoop up local events, the lineup posters continue to bleed together while the cultures that used to set them apart continue to meld. It can make it hard to find a weekend where you'll be able to frolic in fields with your own particular brand of weirdos, but don't lose hope. There are still campgrounds and billings where you can find your tribe.

Below, we're highlighting the outposts still clinging to their freewheelin' roots. (Oh, and Coachella.)

TrailBlazer Hunter Mountain, NY June 12-14

It's hard to beat the vibe of a massive country concert, unless, of course, you've got a country festival on your hands. There are many around the county, but 2020 will witness the birth of a brand new event: TrailBlazer in upstate New York, at the former grounds of the Taste of Country Festival. Headlined by Dierks Bentley, Thomas Rhett, and Luke Bryan, the top-tier isn't exactly staffed by hard-to-find acts, but a welcome sleaze arrives with The Cadillac Three and Hardy, while Kelsea Ballerini promises a pop-crossover punch.
